Training steelworkers for the future

Apprenticeship and training programs can help people looking to re-enter the workforce learn the valuable skills needed to secure a good paying job. William Hill from Indiana is one of those people. He signed up for ArcelorMittal's Steelworker for the Future program, an apprenticeship program where he got technical experience while studying engineering - an opportunity that eventually led to a job offer.

Read William's story and about how we can create more training opportunities that can reach more workers in Steelworkers for the Future: We'll need more, but are they part of Trump's plan? – a piece by NSC CEO Andy Van Kleunen and NSC Board Chair and President of the Alliance for American Manufacturing, Scott Paul.
